Class of 2027

Get Hype At the annual class games for Winter Carnival, sophomores Samuel McCullough, Quinn McCune, and Elijah Schuemann cheer on their fellow classmates as they participate in a game. Samuel enjoyed the opportunity to have fun with his friends. "The environment in the gym is so energetic and I love the competitiveness between us and the junior class," Samuel said. (Photo: Olmstead)

You're no longer a freshman, but you're not quite an upperclassman either. It's like being in a bit of a middle zone, where you're figuring out who you are and where you fit in. You're starting to get the hang of high school life, but there's still plenty of room for growth. One of the key things about sophomore year is that you're beginning to really understand the expectations of high school. You've survived the first year, so you know what's up when it comes to balancing schoolwork, social life, and extracurricular activities. There's a little less of the "new kid" feeling.
